Recent studies of fitness landscapes in evolution have revealed that fitness landscapes in organisms display complex topologies, including a large proportion of "pathogenic" regions with a negative contribution to fitness. We discuss here several possible definitions of pathogenic regions that arise from the measurement of the contribution of alleles to pathogenicity. In particular, we use a recently developed method for detecting pathogenic regions, called HKA, to measure the extent to which deleterious mutations will cause a heterozygote to be more or less likely to produce an animal with an altered phenotype. We also examine the utility of this measure to test some of the assumptions underlying the Theory of Island Evolution. Specifically, we focus on a possible trade-off between changes in frequency of a deleterious mutation and its pathogenic effect. We show that the HKA measure provides a potentially informative tool for testing these assumptions.Q: Dynamically modifying a page I am trying to build an application that will allow users to be able to modify the database tables that they own. For instance, if I have a table called users and a column called status and have the primary key being the users id, I want the user to
