Usefulness of low-dose dobutamine stress echocardiography for the identification of inducible myocardial ischemia. This study sought to analyze the feasibility and clinical value of low-dose dobutamine stress echocardiography. Dobutamine stress echocardiography has long been used to evaluate patients with coronary artery disease and left ventricular dysfunction because it has a greater diagnostic efficacy than exercise stress testing. However, the limit of the usual standard dose (20-40 microg/kg per min) is known to be higher than the maximum achievable dose and it has been suggested that at higher doses, especially at low doses, coronary microvascular dysfunction occurs. Low-dose dobutamine stress echocardiography (7.5 to 30 microg/kg per min) is an effective method of diagnosing inducible ischemia. A total of 107 patients with coronary artery disease were enrolled. In each of the patients, coronary angiography was performed during dobutamine stress echocardiography. The sensitivity and specificity of low-dose dobutamine stress echocardiography were 88% and 67%, respectively. In addition, the association of the result of low-dose dobutamine stress echocardiography and the presence of inducible ischemia at coronary angiography was analyzed by using a receiver operating characteristic curve. The area under the curve was 0.744 (95% CI 0.632-0.856) and the optimal cutoff point was Cardiac sympathetic function is modulated by endothelial nitric oxide. Our previous studies showed that endothelial nitric oxide synthase (eNOS) gene knockout mice (eNOS(-/-)) had increased myocardial norepinephrine (NE) level and reduced cardiac contractility compared to wild
