When you save a file from Photoshop, you can access the file at any time even after you close Photoshop. This creates an _.app_ file, and the application is always open. If you close and re-open the file, the application will always open the same way you originally opened it. This is both a convenience and a hazard. Opening a file gives you access to the original. If your computer crashes, or you want to export a file as another file format, you need to close and reopen the file if you want to change it. If you don't, you'll never get the new changes or saving the file back to its original state. # Editing files Photoshop provides four types of editing tools: * The _brush_ tool is probably the simplest type of tool in Photoshop and has no settings, but it is very helpful. It is the primary tool for enlarging and creating new content. * The type tool enables you to select a font or create a graphic text object. * The pen tool enables you to select and edit shapes with various settings. * The marquee tool enables you to select a portion of an image and quickly select multiple areas for cropping or rotating. Figure 2-1 shows the tools available. FIGURE 2-1: The tools in the Edit toolbox. Most of the tools have an Options button, as shown in Figure 2-2, that enables you to change options and settings, such as the type of softening (the smoothing effect) applied to a brush or type tool. Some other useful settings include * Size The radius with which to create a circular object. * Soften/Harden The degree to which to soften or harden the object. * Text The settings used to create the style of text on an object. * Color The color used for a selected object, including the color of any gradient applied to an image. * Select The settings used to choose a portion of an image for cropping or rotating. FIGURE 2-2: Options for the type tool appear when you click a tool's Options button. You can even toggle the visibility of tool options by pressing the keyboard shortcut: Ctrl+spacebar. When the type tool is active, you can select a font from the Font Gallery, as shown in Figure 2-3. You

The government's move aims to improve business productivity, boost workforce and link with the corporate sector to ensure an essential link between digital services and Australian small and medium sized businesses. In recognition that enterprises spend about 4% of their annual IT budget on software for internal use and up to 30% on commercial software, the government will provide a premium tax rebate of up to $2,500 on subscription software costs. IT Minister Arthur Sinodinos said in a media release that, "Supporting an industry of software developers and small software businesses in their drive to create new subscription applications and services for Australian businesses will improve productivity and create and export skilled jobs." The conditions for the rebate apply to both in-house and third-party subscriptions. This means that Australian enterprises can purchase a product, or even a service where it adds value, and receive the rebate on their total software subscription costs. The change comes as small and medium sized business owners continue to struggle with a growing fee burden and poor service from big providers. Kevin Sheedy, Executive Director of Tech Business Australia says, "Without these tax incentives, online software subscription platforms will be more expensive for Australia's small businesses to use than their locally-hosted counterparts, which may mean less of these online services used in the long term." The announcement follows a review into small and medium sized business enterprise software usage and pricing undertaken by the Australian Digital Commerce and Consumer Action Board, in partnership with the Digital Inclusion Project Australia and the Australian Software Association.
